DON'T BELIEVE EVERYTHING YOU HEAR

In his letter to employees on Aug. 16, KCPL President Drue Jennings said, "I would caution all of you not to be surprised at any . . . claims of victory by Western Resources." As Jennings predicted, Western issued news releases and media statements speculating about the outcome of the vote. In fact, Western representatives arrived at our shareholders' meeting armed with copies of a news release while some shareholders were still in the process of voting.

The simple fact is that the outcome of the vote will not be known until the counting of the votes is complete. Since neither KCPL nor Western knows what proxies the other has, there is no way to predict with certainty the outcome of the vote. The figures Western cited in its news release are based on speculation and assumptions.

Using its speculative results, Western continues to proceed with its hostile tender offer. Some shareholders may be duped into believing they should tender their shares, when in fact there is no reason to do so. Western has not suddenly become an attractive merger partner for KCPL. When questioned by reporters on that issue in his press conference on Aug. 16, Jennings stated clearly that we believe Western and KCPL do not have a good strategic fit, and a combination with Western would not assist KCPL in meeting its long-term strategic goals.

Western's exchange offer to KCPL shareholders is not scheduled to expire until Sept. 20, so its aggressive media campaign will undoubtedly continue. Because Western still has not received the appropriate regulatory approvals and has not satisfied certain other conditions to its offer, it will most likely extend the Sept. 20 deadline from time to time over a substantial period of time.

Senior Vice President Turner White, asked by reporters to comment on Western's speculations, said, "Remember, Dewey predicted victory over Truman, too." And a lot of newspaper headlines had to be retracted and changed with the final votes were counted.

COUNTING THE VOTES

With nearly 62 million KCPL shares outstanding, Corporation Trust Company, the independent inspector of election, has its work cut out.

- - First, it must determine that all proxies received are from shareholders eligible to vote.
- - Then it must go through all proxies to eliminate duplicates and be sure that only the last proxy received is counted.
- - It must verify that each proxy is properly signed and dated.
- - Finally, the vote must be reconciled. For example, if a shareholder sent a proxy to Western voting against the UCU merger but later decided to send one to KCPL in favor of it, then the independent inspector of election must be sure that only the duly executed proxy signed closest to the close of the polls is counted.

Considering the large number of proxy ballots mailed to shareholders, it's easy to see why this process will take some time.

The independent inspector of election will spend the next few weeks tabulating the vote. Preliminary results should be available sometime in September. After both sides receive the preliminary results, each will have the opportunity to examine and challenge the proxy tabulation. Following that, the vote will be certified and made public. Until then, no one will know with certainty what the outcome of the vote is.
